"Yes, we've certainly had a speil of bail weather," the Mayor said to an Evening World reporter, glancing through the window, his gaze finally esting on the green sward. "Ah," excepting the Mayor, indicating a brown "Yes, we've certainly had a spell of baid weather," the Mayor said to an bird. "there is our fair weather birdtruly a harbinger of a fine day."

The bird-a brown thrush-is a fre quent visitor in City Hall Park and

"Weather sometimes rends a man's soul, even including he who wears a crown, I believe—but, hang heavy or light, the executive grind always is the same. Weather good or bad doesn't equalize affairs of state," and the Mayor manied.

"But what a joy it is to work on a fine day! But bad weather has its virtues, after all. One thing, it brevents a fellow from violating the automobile speed laws," and the Mayor laughed outright.

"Then too much gunstline is like too."

Enveloped in a rain-coat, his shoes incased in light rubbers and carrying an umbrella, Mayor McClellan walked from his residence to the City Hall to-day.

By the time the Mayor reached the City Hall the sun made its first appearance in five days.

"That's luck for you!" he avaled and a prefixed as a prefude to a fine day."
